

For the Saturday Gazette.

REMINISCENCES OF FOREIGN TRAVEL—JOHN HUSS.

How well I remember one hot August day, as we drew up to the little steamboat dock at Constance! How refreshing was the gentle breeze that blew softly off the lake, making us forget how weary and travel-worn we were; while the verdant landscape before us, rich with the coming harvest, seemed to speak and greet us, as we left free Switzerland behind, to enter the despotism of the great Emperor William! We were now at Constance in Baden, but within a stone's throw of Switzerland, Austria, Bavaria and Württemberg, all of which join on the Lake of Constance. The day was hot and sultry, we were weary and tired of traveling, impatient to reach Munich, and in no mood to be interested in the gloomy old town before us. I am afraid that it was with some exertion, and a good deal of grumbling that we commenced seeing the sights; but how well repaid do I feel now! What money could buy the pleasure that comes from looking back to the place, which for four years attracted the attention of the whole civilized world? And as the names of the great men of that day are brought up in reading, how familiar they seem! They are like old friends, and are not shrouded in the dim obscurity, which usually invests characters of a by-gone age. Truly the most enjoyable part of traveling is to look back—the reminiscences—there is the charm. How eagerly the old sailor spins his yarn of past experiences, and the farther back it is, the more he enjoys it. The old man talks to his grand-children of his youth, and it comes back to him clothed with pleasure and sunshine. It is not without a feeling of sadness that a place like this is visited. An old tumble-down town, going fast to decay, with little or no life, where once there was so much, is not a joyous picture. It is like looking upon the wreck of a man, who has hardly a vestige of manhood left, but who once was all that honor and talent could make him.

The old building in which the famous Council of Constance held its sittings is still in existence, and turns the thoughts back to that stirring time, years before America was discovered, when the Church was almost in anarchy.

The Council was convened Nov. 16, 1414, having for its object the correction of the Western schism, occasioned by the residence of the Popes at Avignon, France. Three Popes claimed the Pontifical Chair, all of whom by various means and holy intrigues had valid claims to the seat of St. Peter. Every one was disposed, of the first and most prominent, the ambitious Balthasar Cosca, who styled himself John XXIII, resigned under great pressure; as also Gregory XIII. But Benedict XIII. would not resign, so he was ruled out as a "schismatic, heretic, and scandalous sinner." Martin V. was then agreed upon, and the politics of the church were straight again. It was by this Council that John Huss, and Jerome of Prague were condemned to be burned to death for their heresies. Huss having been summoned to Prague twice, and neither time complying, was finally induced to appear before the Council to answer the charges against him, on a safe conduct being assured. All know how ignominiously he was deceived, and dragged to the stake with scarcely a hearing of his case; how he met death with a fortitude which moved even his judges and executioners to admiration.

Huss died July 6, 1414; and Jerome of Prague, his firm friend and supporter, met the same fate a year later. Just as the sun was going down we walked outside the town to an open field, and stood by the very spot where this brave and noble man ended a career that can hardly find its parallel in all the records of martyrdom.

The spot is simply marked by a large stone, with an iron railing encircling it. The sunset was beautiful, and there in the open country, where all was fresh and green, not a sound reaching the sea, but the gentle night wind, we stood and thought. The heavens were dyed with the most exquisite colors, from the softest shade of blue to the most fiery red; a broad landscape lay before us, with all that nature and the art of man can do to beautify earth; on every side all was in perfect repose. And we, strangers from a distant land, where there was a moral darkness which once had its sway over the whole civilized world. We, who live in an age of civilization, and in a land of freedom, cannot look back on these scenes without a feeling of amazement, and even horror.

It is hard for us to think of such a piece of injustice and cruelty as this, (burning a man for his belief) sanctioned more or less by the men of settlement and learning of that day. For this act was not the decree of a heartless despot, but the judgment of the most learned men assembled from all parts of the world.

As I stood on that sacred ground, the hot July day of centuries ago, with all its strange doings, seemed to rise up before me. I could see the crowd gathering long before the sun was up, all eager to get a good position. As time elapsed, and the day advanced, towards noon, the crowd increased, and becomes more impatient; threats are uttered against the judges if the sentence is not carried out; coarse jokes are heard on every side, with boisterous and ill-tempered laughter; the crowd, every minute is becoming more uproarious, until the prisoner appears. With bowed head and thoughtful brow, hardly noticing the scene about him, he advances strongly guarded to the stake. Around him a party of exultant priests stand on one side; on the other the face of the infernal rebel himself, bloated and distorted with the marks of every sin; another looks calmly on with a self-satisfied air, that speaks better than words his share in this unrighteous deed. Look on the throng again; there are little children, men with hoary heads, just stepping into the grave, women of every condition, youths that are old in sin, although young in years. Here and there an innocent face is seen, and as the dying man lifts his eyes, does he not meet some friendly gaze? Yes, you can see his eyes brighten from time to time, and he looks more firmly set in his purpose. He has a determination that nothing but the will of God can shake.

A few words of retraction will save his life, but no, he knows he is right, and will die, leaving a record behind that will encourage Luther, and give strength to many a man in coming time. Such a man never dies.

The town contains several interesting monuments. The cathedral, a handsome gothic structure, which was pronounced upon Huss, and the house where he held it, are the two points of interest. Huss' house, as it is called, is one of the rudest buildings imaginable; little windows, and a rude effigy of the great man outside are its chief characteristics. Everything in the vicinity relates to, or has some tradition connected with him, and it seems as if the name of the town should be changed and called Huss.

A. D. W.

Mr. W. H. Wickham, the mayor elect of New York City, was born at Smithtown, Long Island, in 1832, but has lived in N. Y. city from early childhood. He has always been identified with the Democratic party, although he has never held a public position, nor until this fall, has he been a candidate for any office. He was also an active member of the Mercantile Library Association, and served for five years as one of its officers. He is a well-informed, cultivated gentleman, and has spent much time in foreign travel. He is a member of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church.
